HISTORY OF DANE COUNTY

Dane County has played a brilliant and outstanding role in the history of Wisconsin. Only half a century after the landing of the Pilgrims, Marquette and Joliet navigated the Wisconsin River which borders Dane County. Another century and a half passed before the United States Government took possession of Dane County from the Native Americans, following the Blackhawk War. The first Wisconsin territorial legislature, meeting in 1836, created Dane County. The same legislature voted to establish the capitol of the territory in the wooded area between the third and fourth lakes in the chain of lakes situated in the southern part of Wisconsin.

The christener of Dane County, Territorial Judge James Doty, also named the capitol city of Madison, in honor of the nation's fourth president. The county was named for Nathan Dane of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee which drew up the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory.

In 1839 Dane County was organized as a separate governmental unit with the free election of a three-man board of commissioners to formulate county policy. This commission form of government was abandoned in 1857 in favor of the larger Board of Supervisors, only to be reinstated during the Civil War, and then finally abandoned altogether in 1870 for the Board of Supervisors. The struggle between these two forms of government no doubt reflects the conflict of interests of the voters; a wider and more democratic representation is claimed for the larger Board of Supervisors, while greater administrative efficiency is claimed for the Board of Commissioners.

Back to 1840--immigration was gathering momentum. In that year there were but 314 settlers; in another ten years there were 16,639 settlers who purchased land from the government for $1.25 an acre. These early people, migrating from the east and the south were experienced and highly literate pioneers. One of their first projects was the building of a school house in 1839 at a cost of $70. Later immigrants came from other countries. Norwegian, Swiss, and German settlements sprang up. The township of Mazomanie was settled by a temperance society from England. The Norwegians had come to Dane County just as it was being opened and being from an agricultural land, settled here. They started growing tobacco as their chief crop. Today, Wisconsin ranks as an important tobacco producer.

With the admission of Wisconsin to statehood, immigration increased. By 1900, there were 70,000 persons in the county, equally divided between urban and rural. The 2000 census shows a population of over 426,000 persons in the county with 74,775 being found in the 34 townships, 59,626 in the 19 villages and 292,125 in the 8 cities.
